1. M. Fedorowicz, Monograph titled "Supervision of the European Union financial market", Warsaw 2013, pp. 1-520, (book written in Polish). The fundamental scientific aim of my post-doctoral dissertation "Supervision of the European Union financial market" is to present a comprehensive theoretical and dogmatic legal analysis of the new EU supervision regulation known as the European System of Financial Supervision (ESFS). The newly-established supervision structure is composed of a macro-prudential pillar with the European Systemic Risk Board (ESRB) at its head, and micro-prudential pillars endowed with supervisory authority over the banking and payment institution market (European Banking Authority, EBA), over the capital market and ratings agencies (European Securities and Markets Authority, ESMA), and over the insurance market and occupational pensions schemes (European Insurance Occupational Pensions Authority, EIOPA). Entry into force of the aforementioned financial market supervision regulation on January 1, 2011, has brought such significant changes to both the supervision architecture and sectoral legislation in the EU that a new, comprehensive theoretical and practical approach is required. The objective of the dissertation, as detailed above, was to undertake an analysis of EU financial market supervision regulation, which constitutes a new supervisory model created at the EU level developed on the bases of experiences of previous Lamfalussy committees and the integrated supervision structures of EU Member States. In the dissertation, the hypothesis is presented that the entry into force of the ESFS regulation has brought about such significant changes in both existing EU legislation concerning the financial market and in the theoretical approach to issues of EU financial market supervision that grounds have been established for a reconstruction and comprehensive analysis of a new normative dimension in the European Union's financial market supervision architecture, as well as for an attempt at establishing a new normative concept of EU supervision.
